肆 閱讀測驗：選一個最佳的答案 10%

Communication is more than just speaking and listening—often we communicate with body language, which can tell us more than the words we say and hear. For example, look at the way people greet each other in different cultures. Japanese people bow deeply to each other, while the French and other Europeans kiss friends on the cheek. The Thais make a graceful “wai” by placing their hands together under the chin while making a slight bow. The Russians are famous for their enthusiastic bear hugs. In Mexico, younger people traditionally kiss the hands of older people. In some societies, it is acceptable for people to touch each other when they meet, but in other countries kissing and hugging is considered too intimate.

Sometimes strange problems can come up when people from different cultures meet. An American would be very surprised if a Mexican child tried to kiss his hand. Foreign tourists in Europe are sometimes shocked to see two men kiss when they meet each other. When former Russian President Yeltsin gave Japanese Prime Minister Hosokawa a giant hug, the Prime Minister Hosokawa looked very uncomfortable and was obviously glad when the hug was over.

These days when people from different countries meet, they are likely to shake hands. A handshake is a good compromise because it allows people to touch each other without getting too close for comfort. You can tell a lot about someone by the way he shakes hands. A person with a strong, firm grip is probably confident and friendly. If he looks you in the eye when he shakes your hand, then you might think he's honest and direct. On the other hand, someone with a weak handshake is probably shy and not so sure of himself. If he doesn't look you in the eye, it could mean he has something to hide or he's just not interested in meeting you.

In some societies, it is acceptable for men to put their arms around each other and for women to hold hands while walking down the street. In other cultures, however, this kind of behavior would be considered strange. If you're not sure of the local customs, the best thing to do is watch how other people act and then follow what they do. When in Rome, do as the Romans do.
