The early adolescent seems to be in a state that is difficult for most adults to understand. Parents, in particular, are often at a loss for how to deal with someone they thought they knew but who now seems changed. Changeability and contraction are characteristic of youngsters during this time. They want to be independent and reject parental control, appearing at times extremely rebellious. At the same time they conform almost sheepishly to their peers' standards of dress, music, and behavior. They seem to be completely self-centered and materialistic one moment, then suddenly shift to an altruistic giving of themselves in the service of some social or political cause. They can be extremely inconsiderate and tactless one day, remarkably sensitive the next. Their moods can change within minutes from being on top of the world to feeling that everything is hopeless. Consistency is totally missing, and these rapid shifts and contradictions seem hard to comprehend.

6. Parents find adolescents hard to understand because _____
- (A) they are always self-centered and inconsiderate.
 - (B) they are inconsistent.
 - (C) the parents feel loss.
 - (D) they want to be independent.

 - (C) adolescents are treated too softly in today's society.
 - (D) parents should be more strict with their adolescent children.
